Then followed the whigs, Clay worshipers and Webster followers often fighting each other more bitterly than they did the common enemy. Fifially there came to be southern whigs and northern whigs, conscience whigs and old-line whigs—and then the party died. Then came the republican party, which still reigns.

On the other side of the major political fence there were, at the beginning, Jefferson republicans and Burr republicans. They were succeeded in order by factions of peace republicans and war republicans, conservative republicans and voung republicans, Jackson democrats and conservative democrats, Jackson democrats and conservative democrats, Lecompton and anti-Lecompton democrats, Douglas and Breckinridge democrats, war democrats and copperheads, Randallites and Carlisleites, gold and silver democrats; Cleveland and Bryan democrats, and now radical and conservative democrats, all very hungry for power and apparently almost cal and conservative democrats, all very nungry for power and apparently almost illing to kiss and make up.

Grant, although he had never been active in poliics and had been a democrat, was nominated by a unanimous vote. He was elected by a huge majority, and the re-publicans again carried the House of Representatives. Two years later the demo-erats made substantial gains in the lower House, cutting the republican majority to thirty-five. There were signs of trouble in the air.

The party split began in Missouri in 1870. Already, in some of the reconstructed southern states, there were two parties among the loyalists—radicals and conservatives. In Tennessee the conservatives conservatives. In Tennessee the conservatives had won, and civil government was thereby restored. In many of the southern states civil government was not fully restored until 1876. In Missouri, however, the two wings of the party took the names of radical and liberal. The liberal faction was opposed to the administration method of dealing with the "states lately in rebellion." Headed by B. The idea that to invite more than one person to dinner necessitates an elaborate spread is a serious error, for such an entertainment means previous work on the and brings a general feeling of relief when the meal is over.

when the meal is over.

Moreover, unless all details can be executed and are in accord with one's usual way of living an elaborate dinner becomes ostentatious, than which nothing is worse form. The art of entertaining is to give enjoyment by having persons within one's home, and unless they are made comfortable and at ease the purpose fails completely.

A dinner for six or eight persons will fill all the requirements of formal entertaining if the menu consists of soup, an entree or fish, a roast with vegetables, a salad, followed by a dessert. Coffee may be served afterward in the sitting room.

A long, straight strip rounded off at the corners should be edged with the marabou and lined with a soft silk, the color matching or harmonizing with the velve-teen.

The round muff should be covered with the velvet flat, the edges overlapping in the middle of the front, the flap lined with silk and held down with a row of three handsome buttons or three tiny rosettes of ribbon.

The ends of the muff could be edged with the marabou.
